GEDUNG KUNING THE STORY

1800s —

Gedung Kuning was built in the late 1850s and its exterior was inspired by the Palladian architecture which is a European architectural style that was trendy back in the day.

The exterior of Gedung Kuning was constructed using wood and bricks, reflecting its European influences externally.

The interior of Gedung Kuning, like the former Istana Kampong Glam next to it, follows the design of a traditional Malay house.

According to the official sources, the locals referred to this building by several names such as Rumah Bendahara and Gedung Kuning. In 1864, the youngest son of the Sultan of Johor, Tengku Mahmud, named his mansion Gedung Kuning which means Yellow Mansion, after its yellow walls.

1912 —

In the Nusantara region and Malay world, yellow is the colour often associated with royalty. Yellow is a royal colour commonly associated with Malay Sultans. Since the bungalow was initially built to be the resident for the heir of the royal family, it was probably the reason why it was painted yellow. According to what is being recorded by the historian, this heir refers to Tengku Mahmud. It has become a widely accepted information that Tengku Mahmud may have stayed briefly at Gedung Kuning. Because of its royal connections, the local has referred to the bungalow by many names - such as Rumah Bendahara and Gedung Kuning (Yellow Mansion).

In 1912, Haji Yusoff purchased Gedung Kuning and sold it some years later. He subsequently bought it again and this Yellow Mansion served as a residence for Haji Yusoff's family.
